

Learn a sport with a tagger

Do you want to learn a sport and earn points at the same time? If so, tagging is for you. A tagger is something that makes a short sharp sound. Your coach tags when you get a move right or get close to it. The tag tells you that you got the move right and have earned a point. this will encourage you to do the move again. Your coach will award your points after you have earned a few tags and are ready to stop for a second or two. At the end of your lesson, you can cash in your points for treats or other rewards.

When your coach tags

Your coach will tag when you get the move right or get close to it. Your coach will tag for every small step you do correctly so you don't get frustrated. This will make your lesson fun and easy. If you get confused or don't know what to do next, don't worry-- your coach will not get angry or yell. Your coach will find another way to teach the skill you got stuck on and make it easier for you. Your coach will tag often if you are a beginner or are having trouble learning the skill. Your coach may tag less often if you are more experienced or having an easier time.

Points for treats

In many activities, the coach gives the treat right after the tag. In some sports this is dangerous or too difficult. Instead, your coach may give you a label to stick on your jacket and write points on your label during our lesson. Or your coach may have some other way of keeping track of your points. You'll get a point for each tag and sometimes you'll get a jackpot (lots of points) when you make a lot of progress all at once. You can trade in your points for something you want when your lesson is over, or you may be able to save them up to trade for something even better after a few lessons.
